INTRODUCTION

THE BACKGROUND

The unique local interest of the county lay subsidy rolls in the Public Records Office has long been recognized by local record societies. Since the latter half of the nineteenth century they have been responsible for the publication of selected assessments for more than a dozen counties¹ and these have proved a valuable aid to historical and genealogical research. Until now, however, none of the extant assessments for Kent has appeared in print, and the present edition of the fifteenth and tenth² of 1334 is an attempt to remedy the deficiency.

The roll (E179/123/12) consists of twenty-nine parchment membranes, most of which measure one foot by three feet fastened at the top in the form of a file. It contains 11,016 names and assessments arranged in double columns. The roll was chosen from among a number of assessments suitable for publication: thus the 1327 subsidy roll is of equal length and the roll of 1338 contains about 17,000 names. Yet the assessment of 1334 is of special interest as a turning point in the history of medieval taxation in the county and as the first in a series of assessments unique among English subsidy rolls after this date.

The tax on moveables, originally copied from ecclesiastical practice, was at the time of its inception in the late twelfth century a radical departure from the old cumbersome methods of feudal taxation.³ Although it long retained something of the character of an emergency measure requiring the justification of a war or other crisis it was applied with increasing frequency in the course of the thirteenth century and a regular machinery of assessment and collection was gradually evolved. By the first years of the reign of Edward III the practice was to issue commissions from the exchequer appointing two experienced royal servants as chief taxors to supervise the assessment and collection of the tax in each county. These in turn, acting on specific instructions, were responsible for the appointment of sub-assessors, four or more of the "best men" in each city, borough and vill (or, as was more usual in Kent, in each hundred) to assess the property of their neighbours.

The names of the taxpayers in each local district and the amounts were set down on rolls, copies of which were handed to the chief taxor. From them was compiled the formal county roll which was returned to the exchequer.

In 1334 the whole character of the tax was altered. The collection of the previous subsidy of a fifteenth and tenth granted in 1332 had been accompanied by more than the usual measure of popular discontent and there were widespread charges of extortion against the chief taxors, many of whom were eventually brought to trial. When parliament was asked again to grant a subsidy in September 1334, there was a general demand that there should be no recurrence of such abuses. As a result certain changes in the mode of assessment and collection were decided upon. In each county the two chief taxors, of whom one was to be a Religious, were instructed to treat with the men of each local district and to agree upon a lump sum or fine for their share of the subsidy. If no agreement could be reached they were to make the assessment themselves; the amount levied in any district was not to fall below that raised by the 1332 assessment. Collection of the money was entrusted to the Religious alone.

In Kent the chief taxors appointed by a writ dated 4th October 1334⁴ were Thomas Bacoun and the Abbot of St. Augustine, Canterbury. Bacoun, a royal servant of long standing, was a judge of Kings Bench and in September 1334 was the justice of assize in Kent.⁵ In the following year he was appointed as one of the three investigators of suspected irregularities by the chief taxors and collectors of the 1332 subsidy in the counties of Kent, Surrey, Essex, Hertford and Middlesex.⁶ His colleague Thomas Poucyn, Abbot of St. Augustine, had been a simple monk before his election earlier in the same year and his appointment was presumably solely on account of his office. He also acted as collector for the Canterbury diocese of the clerical tenth granted in October 1344.⁷

The new arrangement which set the pattern for all future subsidies meant the "freezing" of what had formally been a variable tax. In succeeding "fifteenths and tenths" the amounts agreed upon in 1334 continued to be charged against each locality. The allocation of the charge within the locality was a matter for the inhabitants themselves and was no concern of the chief taxors. As a result, the returns of the 1334 and of later subsidies for the country as a whole contain, with one exception, only the amounts contributed by each district.

The exception is Kent. For this county both in 1334 and in later years the detailed lists of the individual taxpayers and their assessments continue as before. This special treatment was not the result of any overt royal instruction; the writs issued to the Kent taxors were in exactly the same terms as those sent to other counties. The only official hint that Kent is a special case is found in certain entries in the King's Remembrancer's Memoranda Roll. These show that while the other chief taxors were given abstracts from the 1332 rolls to guide them in their work those for Kent were entrusted with the complete 1332 county roll.¹

Yet if the official documents do not explain the exceptional form of the Kent return it is clear that it is closely linked with the presence in the county of two classes of persons enjoying exemption from the tax, the men of the liberty of the Cinque Ports and the moneyers of Canterbury.² Of these, the moneyers, a small but important group, had been exempted from the national subsidies by a grant of Edward I. The exemption of the Cinque Ports men first conferred in 1260 was established in detail by a royal inspeximus in 1327. This declared that their goods both within and outside the liberty which contributed to the maintenance of the fleet were not to be taxed for tallages or any burdens whatsoever with goods of men not of the Cinque Ports.³

Members of both groups owned personal estate scattered throughout many hundreds and in the 1334 roll the assessments on such property were evaluated and listed separately within the hundred affected. A similar procedure had been adopted in 1332. In this case it is not obvious why it was thought necessary to include exempt persons; a possible explanation is that there was some uncertainty about the continuing exemption of the Ports. In the case of the 1334 and later taxes, however, an explanation is easier to find. Assuming that the chief taxors acting in accordance with their instructions, negotiated a lump assessment for each hundred, this would normally be related to the amount raised in 1332. If, however, the amount for a hundred containing some Cinque Port property were estimated on the basis of the sum actually collected in 1332 without taking account of exempt property there was a danger that the result would be unfairly high. For if the property owned by the Cinque Port men had increased since 1332 it is obvious that the amount actually due from the hundred ought to be proportionally lower. Thus in 1334 and in all later subsidies the amount assessed on the Cinque Ports men is always deducted from the charge against the hundred as a whole. The complete omission of the boroughs of Dover, Sandwich, Hythe and New Romney, which were wholly within the liberty of the ports, accords well with this explanation as no problem would arise in these cases. It is, however, rather surprising that it was felt necessary to list the individual contributions in those hundreds in which there was no exempt property, but presumably this was because of the possibility that an exempt person might have acquired property there in the interval since the previous return.

Another puzzling fact is that in the neighbouring county of Sussex which also contained several member ports of the Cinque Port confederation no reference of any kind is made to Cinque Port property either in 1332 or in the 1334 subsidy.⁴ Perhaps the men of the liberty there were not considered sufficiently numerous or their property sufficiently dispersed to warrant special consideration.

Although in the peculiar circumstances that existed in Kent the former method of assessment would probably have been the simplest means of raising the subsidy it seems clear that in 1334 the chief taxors carried out their mandate to negotiate lump assessments with the men of each local tax unit. The charge against the county as a whole shows an increase of £110 16s 0d over the amount raised in 1332. The figures for twelve hundreds taken at random show increases ranging from 9s 6½d for Beckenham to £4 13s 4d for Ringslow over the corresponding amounts in 1332. In the majority of instances the increases are in round figures of pounds or marks, suggesting that they were arrived at in a rather arbitrary fashion.

Once the charge against a particular hundred had been decided the calculation of the individual contributions would have been a difficult task. The burden must be distributed among the taxpayers, whose numbers might have increased or diminished since 1332, in a way that would take account of the differences in their personal estates. In other counties, as we have seen, the problem was one which did not concern the chief taxors. Did the Kent chief taxors actually play a part in deciding the individual amounts by appointing and supervising sub-assessors or did they merely receive a copy of the assessments decided upon locally? There is no evidence which might throw light on this question but the latter seems the more likely alternative.

The assessment of Cinque Port property within the hundreds affected was a separate problem. It is known that at least as early as 1353 it was the practice for the Ports to assess their own members and to issue "billets" or "allotments" to the chief taxors.⁵ These listed separately the amounts assessed on an individual for each hundred in which he held property. In the absence of a fixed charge against the Ports as a whole, the assessments can only have been true fifteenths and tenths. Thus in their case the old system was retained.

2 The Hospitals of Ospringe and Maison Dieu, Dover, were specifically exempted from the tax by royal writs (C.R.R.1333-37, pp.257, 352). From the text it is clear that the Hospitals of Eastbridge and Sheppey, the Convent of Sheppey and the London merchant John de Pulteney were also exempt but in these cases I have been unable to trace the official orders

Because the Kentish subsidy rolls after 1332 are the only ones that give the amounts paid by each taxpayer they have a unique importance for the study of the methods of assessment within the hundreds and vills during this period. By comparing one with another it is possible to show how the same burden of taxation was distributed among individuals on each occasion. Such a detailed comparison is outside the scope of the present paper but a brief examination of the 1332 and 1338¹ rolls showed that where the contributions of the same persons can be identified in all three subsidies they frequently fluctuate quite considerably. Changes in the names and numbers of the taxpayers often affect the value of the comparison for a hundred or vill as a whole but in the case of the extra-hundredal vill of Newenden the proportion of names appearing in both the 1334 and the 1338 assessments is sufficiently high to warrant a detailed comparison.

In 1334 the charge against the vill was £1 13s 11d assessed on eleven taxpayers; in 1338 the charge was £1 14s 11d and was paid by twelve taxpayers. Of the original eleven names, nine re-appear in 1338. As one of the newcomers was assessed at 1s – the amount of the increase in the charge against the vill – and the others paid sums exactly corresponding to the amounts shown against the two missing names in the earlier subsidy, it would have been possible to have left the remaining nine assessments as before but this is not done. There are two increases of 1s and 3s 2d respectively, and the rest show decreases ranging from 3d to 1s 9d. The changes must obviously be related to changes in the value of personal estates. It is impossible to say whether this has been achieved by a calculation of an actual fifteenth in each case, with adjustments to make the total approximate to the charge against the vill. Doubtless, similar comparisons for selected hundreds would help to throw light on the method employed.

Of more general interest is the sharp rise in the number of assessments in the 1338 subsidy. There is an increase of about 6,000 compared with the figures for the previous three extant subsidies. The large number of very small assessments noticed in this roll suggests that the burden of taxation was being spread more widely.

The hundredal divisions of the county were clearly settled by the early fourteenth century. Apart from the four Cinque Ports previously mentioned, all the later hundreds of the county appear in the roll, with the exception of Dartford and Wilmington, and of Milton. In the first instance, there is only one vill of Dartford, and in the second, Milton was divided into districts partly within and partly outside the ancient demesne. They were the bailiwicks of Sheppey, parts of Kay, Borden and West, and part of the hundred of Marden, taxed to the tenth, and the rest of Kay and Marden to the fifteenth. Of the other districts assessed as a tenth, Ospringe was a royal manor and ancient demesne, and Seasalter, which was not an ancient demesne, may have been treated as a borough. The vills of Newenden, Malling and Brasted were not in any hundred. The vill of Lesnes and the hundred of Little were later treated as the single hundred of Little and Lesnes.

THE SUBSIDY AS A SOURCE FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF POPULATION

No attempt can safely be made to use the assessment either for estimating the total population of the county as a whole, or of that of the individual hundreds. Assuming that most of the persons in the document were householders, probably under half the heads of families in the county were listed. Thus there are 11,016 names: if the four ports of Dover, Sandwich, Hythe and New Romney were included the total would still have been unlikely to have exceeded 12,000. Yet after forty years, a period during which the population of the county suffered severely from the Black Death, the number of inhabitants, including those of the boroughs, has been estimated from the poll tax of 1377 as about 90,000,² representing perhaps 20,000 families.

The first reason for the incomplete list of names was the non-assessment to the tax of the poorer classes. Until the adoption of the new method of collection in 1334 the instructions to the assessors of the tax always contained a note of the smallest personal estates to be taxed: thus in 1332 the figure was 10s in rural areas, where one-fifteenth was to be collected, and 6s in boroughs and ancient demesnes, where the taxable amount was one-tenth. From 1334 the assessors in other counties were not concerned with individual payments, and no minimum figures were needed. Despite the continuation in part of the old system in Kent, the instructions to Bacoun and the Abbot followed the same form as those for other counties, and no figures were stated. Yet it is clear that the sub-assessors of the individual hundreds did have a minimum value in mind beneath which they were not prepared to tax a personal estate, although this might differ very much from one area to another. Thus in Blackheath hundred, in north-west Kent, the smallest taxable estate was 5s. In the hundreds of Wye and Chart, in central Kent near Ashford, it was 15s and 12s 1¼d respectively. In East Kent, in Petham, Whitstable and Westgate hundreds, it was 12s 6d, 10s and 10s. Clearly many personal estates would have fallen below these figures. The number of persons who escaped would have been increased by the failure in many cases to make a true valuation of goods. From a study of "local" rolls surviving for several subsidies from various parts of England, which appraised in detail the possessions of each taxable person as a preliminary to the final formal assessment, Professor Willard has shown that there was much conventional valuation. Cattle and other livestock, for instance, are often all priced the same, ignoring their likely difference in age or quality, and both beasts and grain are listed at far below their probable market price.¹ Yet another weakness in the assessments lies in the type of moveables assessed. In rural districts livestock and grain and some other crops were probably only valued if they were for sale. Farm implements or household goods were not assessed. On the other hand in the urban communities, while household goods, domestic animals and grain were normally valued, tools and food for the family's use were not included.² Altogether many people besides the actual paupers would not have contributed to the taxes.

1 P.R.O., E179/123/11, 14

2 J.C.Russell, British Medieval Population (Albuquerque, 1948), p.132

If the subsidy cannot be used for discovering the total number of inhabitants of districts or counties as a whole, it may be studied to show the distribution of population between one region and another. Yet even in this more limited field the document should be used with caution. It has been noticed that the minimum taxable figure probably differed from one hundred to another, suggesting that the proportion of householders exempt from the tax would have differed correspondingly. The number of people assessed in each hundred may also have been affected by the type of farming carried on and by the size of its holdings. In the seventeenth century on account of the predominantly clay soil the Weald was an area of mixed farming with the emphasis on livestock, while the more easily tilled and generally richer lands north of the Downs possessed a largely arable economy. It is likely that this contrast between the two regions existed also in the fourteenth century, and, especially if the farmers of the northern area had a considerable corn surplus for sale, that the proportion of taxable farmers would have been higher north of the Downs than in the Weald. Again, it is probable that on account of the difficulty of clearing the forest-covered clay lands of the Weald, the farms in this area in the fourteenth century, as at the later date, were smaller on an average than the holdings north of the Downs; as this would have obviously affected the quantity of corn grown or number of livestock kept by the farmers, this factor too would have tended to produce higher assessment north of the Downs. Yet despite these difficulties in using the subsidy to show the distribution of population, the contrast in the number of taxable people between the various regions of the county is great enough to suggest that it reflects differences in the density of the population.

The population was smallest in the western Weald. Taking the hundreds of Washlingstone and Somerden, and the lowy of Tonbridge together, there were under four and a half taxable inhabitants for each one thousand acres. Settlement in this part of the Wealden forest began late, probably not before the tenth and eleventh centuries, and paled forests and other woodlands may have covered as much as half the area as late as the sixteenth century.

In the remainder of the Weald between Brenchley in the east and Tenterden in the west settlement had begun as early as the seventh and eighth centuries, and forest clearance was probably far more extensive by the fourteenth century. Yet the number of taxable persons for every one thousand acres, in eight hundreds taken together, was only eight, a considerably smaller figure than in any region in the county outside the Weald.³ It was in this area that the next two hundred years were to see the greatest change: in the middle of the sixteenth century, when the cloth industry was at its height, the Cranbrook area in the central Weald had the highest population density of any region of rural Kent.

One of the most interesting features of the subsidy is the large number of taxable people listed under the hundreds lying either on the border of or within Romney Marsh. All the later hundreds were included, and none had fewer than fifty-five names, suggesting that the enclosed area of the marshland was probably little less than its modern extent. In eight hundreds taken together there were approximately ten taxable persons for every one thousand acres, reflecting a population density considerably higher than in the Weald and hardly smaller than in north-west Kent or on the central and eastern downlands.⁴ By the sixteenth century the contrast with the Weald was reversed, and the Marsh had the sparsest population of any area in the county.⁵ If, as seems almost certain, the change reflects an actual decline in the number of inhabitants of the region, one is led to speculate as to the cause of the fall.⁶ Most of the grazing land in the Weald and central Kent is of indifferent quality, and by the later period nearly all the Marsh was used as pasture, much of it providing the richer grazing grounds needed by the more substantial farmers of the uplands: many of the inhabitants, too, were the shepherds and bailiffs of the absentee landholders. It is possible that the higher

3 The hundreds were Barkley, Tenterden, Rolvenden, Blackburn, Cranbrook, East Barnfield, Selbritten and Brenchley

4 The hundreds were St Martin, Langport, Aloesbridge, Newchurch, Oxney, Street, Ham and Worth

5 The comparisons with sixteenth-century population figures are based on: Bodleian Library, Tanner MS. 240: numbers of households and communicants in the parishes of the dioceses of Canterbury, 1557 and 1569; British Museum, Harl. MS.280: total number of communicants in the dioceses of Canterbury and Rochester, 1603

6 Thus the total population of the county in the sixteenth century was little different from that of the fourteenth. In 1377, after the period of the great plagues, it was approximately 90,000; in 1600 it is unlikely to have exceeded 120,000 population of the fourteenth century reflects a greater emphasis on mixed farming with a much higher proportion of resident landholders. The later fall in the number of inhabitants may also have been caused by the decay in the port facilities of the area provided by New Romney and Hythe, consequent on the silting up of their harbours.

The most thickly populated areas of the county were the easily tilled chalklands of the Isle of Thanet comprising the hundred of Ringslow and two areas of rich loam soils, the first in the north-east of the county between Canterbury and Deal, and the second in north-central Kent in the neighbourhood of Faversham. Thus in Thanet there were no less than twenty-five, and in both the north-east¹ and in Faversham area² about fourteen taxable inhabitants for each one thousand acres. In contrast with most of the rest of Kent there may have been little woodland even at this period, and with possible exception of the Faversham region, nearly all the land was unenclosed and nucleated villages were numerous. The easily tilled and often rich soil made the areas particularly suitable for a comparatively intensive arable farming.

On the poorer soils of the downlands of east Kent, also largely unenclosed, the population was smaller, with only eleven taxable inhabitants per thousand acres.³ In north Kent west of the Medway in the fertile region between Stroud and Dartford the figure was only ten and a half.⁴ In the poorer soils in the Blackheath and Bromley areas in the north-west corner of the county, where the remnants of once considerable heath and waste lands survive today, there were only ten people per thousand acres.⁵ To the south, among the parishes lying in and on the edge of the vale of Holmesdale and on the sandstone ridge on its south, where parks and heathlands were of considerable extent, the figure was only seven and a half.⁶ Altogether the western part of the county was much less densely populated than the east, a contrast only partly accounted for by the lower proportion of easily tilled land west of the Medway.

The subsidy throws little light on the comparative size of Kentish towns in the early fourteenth century. It has been noticed that Sandwich, Dover, Hythe and New Romney were not included in the assessment, and the first two at least were urban centres of importance. With 267 persons assessed to the tenth Canterbury was by far the largest of the remaining towns. Rochester, with sixty-one people assessed to a tenth and sixty-nine to a fifteenth, was likely to have been less than half its size. Among the ports only the inhabitants of Folkestone (30) and Faversham (56) as members of the Cinque Port of Dover may be distinguished from the taxpayers of the surrounding countryside within their respective hundreds. No evidence can be found for possible inland towns, such as Ashford, Cranbrook, Sevenoaks or Tonbridge, as they all lay within hundreds covering a large surrounding rural area: only in Maidstone hundred was the population so much higher than that of the surrounding hundreds as to suggest an urban population of possibly as much as one thousand people.

THE SUBSIDY AS A SOURCE FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH

On account of the large size of the county the total tax assessment for Kent was almost the highest among all English counties, being second only to that of Norfolk.⁷ On the other hand, in proportion to its size its wealth was not outstanding. In this respect, Kent, with an average assessment per thousand acres of 39s, came well below a group of Midland counties, including Bedfordshire, Berkshire, Oxfordshire, and Rutland, and Norfolk, with average figures between 45s and 60s. Considering the unique position of the county, lying across the principal trade route from London to the Continent, and the consequent early development of a money economy in the county this fact is at first sight surprising. The extensive underdeveloped forest land in the Weald was undoubtedly one cause: another was the considerable area of poorer land in other parts of Kent, especially along the downland ridge. In fact distribution of wealth within the county was clearly related to the quality of the soil. On the clay and sand of the Weald, where the soil was often both infertile and difficult to work, the average amount paid by the taxpayer, 2s 11d, was low. On the western half of the sandstone ridge and in the vale of Holmesdale to the north, where the soil is very variable, being very barren on the top of the ridge and fertile in parts of the valley the average payment, 2s 11½d, was almost the same. The regions with the richest lands had also, on average, the wealthiest inhabitants: on Romney Marsh and in the border hundreds the average payment was as high as 4s, and in the fertile districts of north-central and north-east Kent the figures were 4s 5½d and 4s 3d respectively. On the less fertile chalklands of Thanet the average assessment was 3s 3d and on the Downs west of Dover it was 3s 7½. The only surprising feature of this comparison was in north-west Kent, where the inhabitants for the hundreds of Hoo, Shamwell and Toltingtrough paid on an average only 3s 4d. For some inexplicable reason this region was both less populated and wealthy than in the fertile areas east of the Medway. Apart from this instance, it has been noticed that the wealth of the inhabitants depended fairly closely on the fertility of the soil. There is no evidence that the presence of open fields on the downlands of east Kent and Thanet and on the rich loam soils of north Kent, and the predominance of enclosed farms in the rest of the county affected the pattern of the distribution of wealth.

A comparison of the wealth of the major geographical regions of the county is only one use for the assessment figures. Contrasts in the average tax payments may often be found within individual regions, among hundreds with soils of similar quality. In the eight hundreds within and on the edge of Romney Marsh the average assessments were, in descending order, 6s 1d, 5s 10d, 4s 11d, 4s 9d, 4s 4d, 2s 8½d, 2s 8d, 2s 6d; in six hundreds in north-east Kent the figures were 5s 1d, 4s 11d, 4s 9½d, 3s 9d, 3s 5½d, 2s 9d. There is no possibility that the use of different minimum figures in the preparation of the assessments was a major cause of these variations. In six out of the eight marshland hundreds the smallest payments were 9d, 10d, 1s (2) and 1s 4d (2); in the hundred with the highest average assessment (St. Martin: 6s 1d), the minimum was 1s; in the hundred with the lowest average assessment (Aloesbridge: 2s 6d) it was 10d. Further, the contrast between the figures is too great to be explained by the possible adoption by the sub-assessors in each hundred of different conventional valuations for the more important items of personal estate such as livestock and corn. In fact, a study of the individual assessments in six of the eight marshland hundreds (see Table) suggests that the contrasts in the average tax payments reflected a real difference in the distribution of wealth. Street and St Martin were the most heavily taxed hundreds, primarily because they included twelve out of thirteen people with the largest personal estate, taxed at between £1 and £1 6s 8d. They also had a comparatively small proportion of people assessed at under 2s 6d. This second feature was also true of Oxney and Newchurch, although they were without the wealthy inhabitants which distinguished Street and St Martin. The people of Longport and Aloesbridge paid on the average the smallest tax, largely because of the very large number with more modest personal estates under 2s 6d, comprising well over half the assessed inhabitants in both hundreds. It is beyond the scope of this introduction to make similar detailed examinations of the distribution of wealth in other regions of the county, but enough has been done to show that marked differences existed between neighbouring hundreds in which the quality of soil was much the same. Although the obvious deficiencies of the subsidy, on account of the omission of the names of many persons not assessed to the tax, should not be allowed to conceal its very real importance in illustrating the distribution of population and wealth in Kent of the first half of the fourteenth century.

EDITORIAL NOTE

In editing the text the general aim has been to make the contents easily readable without departing essentially from the form of the original. Roman numerals have been converted into arabic and Christian names have been anglicized wherever possible. In the case of less well known Latin forms, the English versions given in Trice Martin's Record Interpreter have been adopted and where no English equivalent could be found the original Latin form, converted into the nominative, has been retained. A particular difficulty arises with regard to "occupational" surnames in Latin. It is impossible to know in each case (a) if the name denotes the actual occupation of the person concerned and (b) if it is a surname in itself or merely the Latin form of an English or French family name. For these reasons it was thought best to give the nominative form of the original with an English translation in brackets. "Filius" has been rendered as "son of", e.g. filius Rogeri (son of Roger) though this could well be equivalent to Fitz Roger or Rogers. Contractions have been extended wherever the intention seemed reasonably clear. In doubtful cases the contraction has been left and is indicated by an apostrophe. This applies also to some Christian names e.g. Julian' and Alic'; wherever the full forms occur these read as Juliana and Alice respectively but the possibility of masculine versions cannot be excluded.

When mistakes have been discovered in the calculation of the total assessments for the boroughs, hundreds and vills the correct totals have been supplied in brackets. The total number of assessments for each taxation unit has also been indicated. It should be noted that these do not necessarily correspond to the total of names in each case as two or more names are occasionally included in a single assessment.

With the exception of a little fading in one or two places the document is clear and legible throughout. It is, however, frequently impossible to distinguish between certain letters, especially u and n, o and e, t and c, with any degree of assurance.

The hundred boundaries marked on this map are largely conjectural. There are many reasons for this. It was not until the mid-fourteenth century at least, and certainly after the date of the subsidy roll of 1334-5, that the boundaries assumed anything approximating to the form in which they are now known; from time to time hundreds were merged; vills were eliminated and merged into the hundreds and as a consequence the original lines of division are either completely lost or at best uncertain. There are no maps contemporary with the subsidy and maps of the seventeenth and eighteenth century have had to be used ; all these differ widely in the placing of the hundredal boundaries and none of them is entirely consistent with a modern map of the county. For the most part the boundaries shown on this map are based on Hasted's maps of c.1790 as they appear to correspond more or less with information contained in the subsidy roll, and are drawn on a large scale. (1)

Where two hundreds have been merged into one and the dividing boundary has been lost, some attempt has been made to discover the actual line of division, and to represent the hundreds as they were at the time when the subsidy was taken. In the case of Chart and Longbridge hundred this was determined by the line of the two tributaries of the River Stour which form a natural division and effectively cut the hundred into two equal parts. Evidence of place names in the subsidy roll also suggests that this was so. Similarly the hundred of Bromley and Beckenham has been divided along the line of the River Ravensbourne which is in fact part of the parish boundary. This hundred was not apparently divided, except into half hundreds until 1347, according to Hasted, but in this subsidy roll the two halves have been treated as separate hundreds. Until 1347 it was known as the hundred of Bromley. (2) There was not natural division between the hundreds of Bridge and Petham but internal evidence as to which parishes and places lay in which hundred suggested the line that has been drawn.
